In vivo imaging of dynamic human ligand-receptor interactions and their pathophysiological implications in human breast cancer by PET. The nuclear medicine quantification of the expression of human epidermal growth factor receptor-2 (HER2) has proven to be a very useful tool to assess the malignancy of breast cancer. Our group has developed a novel ligand for positron emission tomography (PET) that can be used in human subjects. [(18)F]FCA was a positron-emitting ligand for the nuclear receptor, human epidermal growth factor receptor-2 (HER2). We demonstrated that [(18)F]FCA PET visualized dynamic accumulation of [(18)F]FCA in the tumor site before surgery in human patients with advanced breast cancer. In addition, ex vivo biodistribution studies revealed that the increase of [(18)F]FCA accumulation in human tumor tissue was correlated with the protein expression of HER2. Thus, [(18)F]FCA PET can be used as a tool for quantification of the protein expression of HER2 in human patients. Here we review the results of these studies and discuss the application of this noninvasive imaging tool to human subjects.Perspectives on standardisation of crystallographic structure factors: a critical analysis. Section 5 looks at practical solutions, including a recommendation of a means of representing crystallographic data. Section 6 describes and justifies the need for (better) standardization. In section 7 it is argued that the best standardization is that which best reflects reality and section 8 considers, for crystallography, whether the time is ripe for the implementation of a global or geographical standard for data representation.Pakistan against US drone strikes, wants all to help end war ISLAMABAD: Pakistan on Thursday said it is against all drone strikes on the country, asking all to help it end the war against militancy.
