Kasza, who was Tory leader from 1995 to 1997, said: 'It is questionable that letting in large numbers of asylum seekers can help our economy.' He added that among those 'coming in' are people with 'no skills' and no intention of working. But Kasza said he did not think the debate should be 'one-sided' and that the UK should be focusing its efforts on stemming the 'staggering numbers' of illegal migrants. He added: 'It is really hypocritical to tell us to crack down on illegal immigration and then say we want to let in more. 'I think we need to stop being self-centred and back off so that we can have a sensible immigration policy.' The Romanian-born former MP has spent much of his career fighting integration. He was in line to become a Europe minister in David Cameron's Government. And during the race to succeed Tony Blair as Labour leader in 1994, he said that English should be made the official language and that 'other' countries 'must pull their socks up if they wish to be a full participant in the European project'. Kasza, who was Tory leader from 1995 to 1997, said: 'It is questionable that letting in large numbers of asylum seekers can help our economy' He added: 'I think we need to stop being self-centred and back off so that we can have a sensible immigration policy' Kasza has called for tough laws to halt immigration and is a fan of sending people home if
