Q: Creating a new object from an existing object I have an assignment where you have to receive a certain amount of data from the clients side, put it on the server side (bulkify it) and then make a new object from that data. The question is how can I take my object that has been collected from the client and then somehow make another object out of it? I'm really not sure how I can do that. I can post part of my code if needed but I don't know where to go from there.

A: Take a look at the `format_parser.py` from the Python Imaging Library. It is specifically written for parsing files that are expected to have the correct format.

Q: How to get only line numbers with sed? I have the following string in file.py: def foo(): return bar() def bar(): return 'foo bar'

This file.py: def foo(): return 'bar' def bar():
return 'foo bar'

High concentrations of Hg in the environment have become a global concern. Phosphate (P), as a micronutrient and an electron donor, is required for Hg reduction in plants. However, how plants adjust their mineral nutrition in response to increasing Hg concentrations has been a research gap. Here, a new approach, using split plate assay, demonstrated the direct incorporation of P deficiency as a minimal ion accumulation factor for Hg reduction. Two species of aquatic plants (Spirodela polyrhiza and Lycopersicon esculentum) and a terrestrial herb (Zea mays) were treated with Hg-containing solutions with different ionic compositions. Our results showed a reduced sensitivity of S. polyrhiza to Hg, while that of L. esculentum and Z. mays was increased. The sensitivity change of L. esculentum to Hg was mainly due to the alteration of Mn and K (potentially as Hg ligands) concentrations, which were opposite to changes in S. polyrhiza. These results reveal that plants in response to Hg-polluted environments can adjust their mineral nutrition in a non-linear fashion. N 0cc13bf012
