The deeper analysis and understanding of the data enables the game to predict and learn player tendencies, meaning that every player and ball in-play has its own unique game-play style and attributes in FIFA 22. Players also have longer jump speeds in the game, with the potential to control the game in crucial moments and show their strength on the pitch. After a release delay from last year, FIFA 17's new engine features stunning Real Player Motion Technology (RPMT), which faithfully captures players' motions in real-time and applies physics to the game with realistic collision interactions. Both FIFA 17 and FIFA 22 will be available this autumn at PlayStation4, Xbox One, PS3, Xbox360, and PC. Check out below the complete range of new features in FIFA 17 and FIFA 22. For a full list of new features in FIFA 17 and FIFA 22, visit the Best New Features page. Hyper-Real Player Motion Technology (RPMT) In FIFA 17, the new Real Player Motion Technology (RPMT) makes you feel like you are playing an actual game of football. The technology recognizes more than 300 specific player movements and applies their physics and animations in the game: The same animation can be played in different ways for each player, and collision dynamics will react in real-time according to the position of the players and the ball. RPMT also includes new defender animations that follow their opponents into open space, and a much more dynamic and accurate system for heading the ball, including the positioning of the player's shoulders, hands and wrists when striking the ball. Motion Tracking FIFA 17 introduces an all-new motion tracking engine, Hyper-Real Player Motion (HRPM), which captures the player's action in detail using multiple high-resolution cameras. The camera data is transferred into a single data file, which is then processed in real-time to calculate the player's specific movements and more than 300 specific in-game actions. Heading In FIFA 17, heading the ball feels completely authentic. Our new heading system is focused on realism and allows the ball to be accurately and realistically head by players of all sizes and positions. The position of the player's shoulder, arms and wrists are all calculated in an effort to create the most accurate simulation possible. Goalkeepers Using an entirely new technique to quantify goalkeepers' performance, we
