Background ===== Microsporidiasis is an emerging and important cause of morbidity and mortality in humans, especially in immunocompromised patients. However, the prevalence of microsporidia in the community is unknown. Thus the aim of this study was to identify the prevalence of microsporidia in persons living in a semi-rural community in Vietnam. Methods ===== Specimens were collected from 1201 hospitalized patients, 391 outpatients and 763 healthy persons from three communes in the Ninh Binh province during 2015. Fecal specimens from all groups were screened for microsporidia using a commercial immunofluorescent assay. Polymerase chain reaction was performed to identify microsporidia species. Results ===== Microsporidia spores were detected in 10.7% of the patients, with a predominance of Encephalitozoon (61.9%) and Enterocytozoon (30.2%). The prevalence of microsporidia infection was significantly higher in patients than in healthy controls (p). In vivo detection of Mycobacterium bovis in cattle by automated acid-fast staining of milk. The results from the ELISA test were compared with the automated acid-fast staining method for the diagnosis of tuberculosis (TB) in milk samples of 200 cows that were examined for evidence of mycobacterial infection. Of the 200 cows, 26 animals were tuberculous, 49 were suspected, and 105 were considered healthy. ELISA detected 16 of 26 (61%) of TB-positive cows, 11 of 49 (22%) suspected TB-positive animals, and 90 of 105 (86%) TB-negative cows. The sensitivity, specificity, and positive and negative predictive value of ELISA for the detection of TB in the milk of tuberculous cows, suspected cases, and healthy cows, respectively, were 61%, 96%, 66%, and 94%. Of TB-positive cows, the ELISA and acid-fast staining methods detected 18/26 (69%) of HSYMINE, a 70-kDa putative neuronal intermediate filament protein. Mammalian intermediate filament (IF) proteins share a structural similarity in the central region of the molecule. In this study, we isolated a novel 70-kDa IF protein from the rat brain. This protein has approximately 20-25 repeats of a novel sequence motif with high homology to amino acids 1-12 of vimentin and amino acids 71-76 of neurofilament protein. The repeated unit is composed of 39 amino acid residues and is encoded by 18 exons in a 48-kb cluster in rat chromosome 10. The second repeat-encoding exon belongs to the same gene as the gene encoding the 6-kDa heat-shock protein. Hence, the 70-kDa protein is designated HSYMINE (hybrid of heat-shock and vimentin-neurofilament), because of its homology to vimentin and neurofilament proteins and its response to heat-shock treatment. It is also noted that HSYMINE is specifically distributed in neuronal cells.
