Access to most of the high-quality herbal medicines is restricted due to the complex processes involved in their production, limited understanding of the biological actions of active ingredients, and the uncertainties in methods of authenticating their properties. Because plant material does not change in the plants' natural environment, herbal medicines can be "frozen" in preparation by traditional processing methods and stored indefinitely (Tien and Chiu, 1995). A few European countries, Australia, New Zealand, and the U.S.A. have signed the WHA Resolution on access to medicines (WHO, 2011). The WHA Resolution states: "As a matter of priority the world health organization recognizes the need for support for the discovery, development and regulatory approval of new and existing products, and the development and implementation of supply systems, to ensure availability of quality essential medicines, diagnostic tests, vaccines, and other health products for all, as part of efforts to attain the health-related Millennium Development Goals by 2015" (WHO, 2011). The transfer and storage of herbal medicines can be achieved by cold storing the products. The main procedures used for the cold storing of herbal medicines are freezing and freeze-drying. Freeze-drying is often used in combination with cold storage. In addition to these two procedures, many medicinal products undergo accelerated stability testing, such as high temperature and accelerated temperature storage in which the temperature is increased above the normal storage temperature (Davies et al., 1991). 3. Different freezing and freeze-drying methods of herbal medicine {#sec1-3} =====
===== A variety of methods for the storage of herbal medicine exist. Cold storage uses various substances that protect the product, such as air, moisture and oxygen barriers (Dastanah and Rahimi, 2008). The benefits of cold storage are that it is inexpensive, and it is simple. Problems are that the product can be damaged by freezing, and liquid and solid components can be separated during freezing, thus contaminating the product. These problems can be solved by applying different methods of freezing and freeze-drying. In freezing, the temperature is gradually decreased to between -100 and 0 °C. This procedure is carried out in a vacuum or in an atmosphere of low humidity (Atallah et al., 1992; Davies et al., 1991).
