Sensory neuropathy due to phenytoin-induced cytochrome P4503A activity. Phenytoin (PHT) is a widely used anticonvulsant with well-recognized adverse reactions. We report a patient who developed neurological symptoms after PHT treatment. The mechanism was subsequently found to be due to an increased activity of the phenytoin-specific cytochrome P450 (CYP) 3A enzyme. Sequencing of the CYP3A4 gene revealed an homozygous mutation of C(516G>T) in exon 6, which encodes an asparagine-to-isoleucine substitution at codon 172. A pharmacokinetic study showed that the patient's clearance of PHT is increased, which explains her adverse reaction. This case report supports a genetic cause for the phenomenon of a selective adverse response to PHT.

Q: Replacing text in bash on a character basis I'm trying to come up with a command for searching and replacing a string on a character basis. I've got the find command working (forgive my noob-ness), but I'm having a little trouble figuring out the correct command to perform the replacement and strip the characters from the string. It seems the replace command only functions for the entire command, so how can I perform a character-based replacement? I've tried using awk, but it doesn't understand the regex used for the find command. Here's the current command I'm using to find and replace text in a file.

#!/bin/bash # Strip the last element of the filename function trim(){ # Find the end of the string and print it find. -name "$1" | cut -
