Free-breathing techniques such as breath-hold, the automatic real-time (ART) algorithm, or gating have also been utilized to minimize motion artifacts in cardiac MR sequences. The automatic real-time (ART) algorithm is based on k-t-regularization techniques, and dynamic programming is used in the gating approach. In the ART method, each k-space sample is divided into segments using a priori knowledge of the motion (cycle or phase) of the tissue region of interest. Following this division, the projection onto convex sets algorithm (POCS) is applied to the segments. Our state-of-the-art Siemens Solutions software is designed to make users as successful as possible. Our software design philosophy is to help you make the right decisions, quickly and with maximum efficiency. When you use the FUGUE operation on Siemens dds-format data, typically the downscaling of the phase-encoding dimension to a uniform amount makes the data unusable for many MRI-based applications. If you have data where the phase-encoding dimension has been downscaled, the FUGUE algorithm can be used to undistort and then recompute the phase information from the linear phase-encoding dimension. You need to apply FUGUE in the fieldmap orientation that was used to acquire the data. This can be done using the FUGUE_Axial operation within FieldMap. Experience a powerful way to speed-up your data at every stage of your analysis, from pre-processing to mapping to deformation and visualization. You can save hours of your time and expertise to the CAD suite with this enhanced version of the toolkit with a full life-cycle solution. Standard functionality included in all Siemens PLM NX variants including the scalable approach which provides all this functionality.
