The Union of South Africa (USA) has confirmed that it will take a decision on whether to participate in the Commonwealth's looming split of Botswana from the Commonwealth. In a special address at the opening of Parliament on Thursday, President Cyril Ramaphosa said the Union of South Africa would reflect on Botswana's withdrawal from the organisation - which it fears will lead to inequality and racial discrimination. "We need to review the rights and obligations of membership," the president said. "I am conscious of the fact that other African countries are also reviewing their position. We need to make sure that we are not in violation of any African Charter. We need to reflect on the national implications of the withdrawal of Botswana from the Commonwealth." He said that if Botswana decided to withdraw, the issue would have to be referred to the African Union (AU) and, if necessary, the United Nations General Assembly. Ramaphosa suggested that Botswana's "abrupt withdrawal" might have been "maliciously motivated". Botswana's withdrawal will take effect at midnight on October 4, and all members have been advised not to deal with Botswana or any of its institutions before then.
