Over 10 years ago, we bought a 5th generation Mac at the Culver City Apple store and, although it was old and slow and just barely kept up with HD editing needs, it was quaintly functional and we were wealthy enough that a slow, clunky workflow wasn't an issue. We needed Photoshop, and a big one. We got ourselves an upgraded copy of version CS3, and then upgraded to Photoshop CC 2015. Everything felt faster, smoother, and more integrated. It refused to open photos from my iPhone with any error message. And I felt amazed by the technology that had been placed inside the application. If you know how well-crafted applications are created, this method of file management is so simple that you may miss the complexity. This is the new normal for large files of any kind. The app now handles large files like (ahem) a veteran pro. If you choose to, images can spill out of the enclosing file, which isn't a particularly creative move. Photoshop has superlative alpha blending, which, while glorious in its own right, also lets you mask out your canvas. The canvas does not accept CMD+C to copy the layer, as you might expect, but rather only allows you to paste the layer, which is also a new feature. Being a trial version, I don't know if it will continue to work consistently. Certainly, it's gone on an unexpected downloading streak to double the size of my existing files. This is the first time on any computer I can recall that file sizes have ballooned so dramatically. This likely will not be a problem for most consumers, but for seasoned pros like myself, it might send signals to be a tad wary. In addition, I'm sure there's a few good reasons I can't see inside the repair box.

They are really very useful for blending multiple exposures together, you can use them to mask the edge of your subject out of an image, or a lot of the time you will just use them to slightly modify the look of a part of the image. That means the link that you provide to the person is never posted. When you share a link, the person receives an offer to install a small extension (which in the case of Mac or Windows may be a Chrome Extension or a Microsoft Edge browser add-on), and if they choose to do so, they are prompted for permission to review and approve your work. If they approve, you can then choose to share the link with the person, or not.
